Yellow the gleam of the sunset
And glowing with light,
The heart of the day is weary
And sne welcomes the coming night,
Deep in the darkening east,
A star in its radiance bright,
Shines over the pale sea line,
Where the wayes fall thick and white. Different Towns and Post Offices in ilent the voices of labor, Silent the voices of labor,

And the beat of the restless flail,
In this holy hour of shadows,
When the day grows wan and pale—
And swallows fly from the meadows
To their homes in the sheltered caves,
And birds in the blossoming orchard
Hide deep in the fragrant leaves.

Oh I oftentimes in the twilight, So many months ago, I sang sweet tender ballads, Yes, sang them soft and low, When the warm wind kissed the roses, And the lily's lips of snow, I sang old tender ballads Without a note of wee.

For I sat in the amber sunset, As the day went down the west, While the sweet face of my baby Against my heart was pressed; The wee face of my darling.
Like a bird in its sheltered nest;
While I sang the dear old melodies, To woo him to his rest.

Till the tints of the sun grew lower

Till the tints of the sun grew lower
